Violence and social change in a border economy : war in the Maputo hinterland, 1984-1992 (JoAnn McGregor) – Stereotypes in the existing literature of a wartime polarization between rural, traditionalist Renamo communities living in isolation from the market and modern, urban society loyal to the government of Mozambique are inadequate and misleading. This is especially true for the borderlands of the Maputo hinterland, where Renamo developed crucial international networks of support in neighbouring South Africa and Swaziland. In the districts of Matutuine and Namaacha, the focus of this paper, Renamo was able, or tried, to elicit support from different sections of the society. The paper first describes the background to the effects of the economic crisis which preceded the war's arrival in Matutuine and Namaacha in 1984. Subsequent sections turn to the war itself, detailing government and rebel relations with civilians, the process of depopulation and the nature of military predation on, and involvement in, the cross-border economy and trade supplying the capital city. 'This neighbour is not my uncle!' : changing relations of power and authority on the Mueda plateau (Harry West) – At independence in 1975, the Frelimo government abolished chieftaincy in Mozambique. Two decades later, Mozambicans are discussing the role to be played by 'traditional authority' in the postcivil war era. Current debates focus on whether or not kin-based political institutions can be considered 'legitimate' expressions of political community in the context of democratic decentralization. In this article, the author approaches the issue of 'traditional authority' as discussants on both sides have not yet done. By examining in detail the complex history of power relations in a specific local context, he illustrates transformations wrought upon kinship-based political institutions and authority figures which add shades of grey to the often black and white arguments over the political 'legitimacy' of 'traditional authority'. The author shows that 'tradition' and political 'legitimacy' are historically situated cultural constructs subject to continuous reworking. The article focuses on the Mueda plateau in the northern Cabo Delgado province, where the inhabitants continue to turn toward family elders in a variety of contexts, despite decades of Frelimo attempts to eliminate kin-based political institutions.  Constructing opposition in Mozambique : Renamo as political party (Carrie Manning) – This article examines the transformation of Renamo from a guerrilla movement, long perceived both abroad and by many Mozambicans as a puppet of the South African apartheid regime, into a political party capable of effectively contesting Mozambique's 1994 general elections. A good deal of attention has correctly been focused on the role of the international community in funding Renamo's 'political miracle'. This article seeks to dig a bit deeper into the nature of Renamo's 'political development' by exploring its attempts to construct a political core during the latter years of the war, in order to boost its image at home and abroad and, eventually, to prepare for a peace agreement. The article differs from other studies on Renamo in two ways: it focuses on nonmilitary aspects of Renamo's organization (in particular its recruitment system), and looks at Renamo from the perspective of those who found themselves serving in the organization's political and administrative structures at the end of the war (1992).  Disarmament in Mozambique (Alex Vines) – In October 1992, a ceasefire in Mozambique was finally agreed upon. The ceasefire signalled the start of a peace process, supervised by the UN's Operation in Mozambique (ONUMOZ). Disarmament was implicit in ONUMOZ's mandate, as a part of demobilization. The UN, however, failed to provide the political and financial resources to ensure that weapons were properly collected and decommissioned. This failure has had serious consequences, especially for South Africa. Post-UN disarmament in Mozambique has been more successful. Since 1995 disarmament has gained speed, and the old weapon caches are no longer such a serious threat to internal security. Ironically, it is South Africa that has suffered most from the peace -dividend, as large numbers of light weapons flowed out of Mozambique. However, joint South Africa-Mozambique police operations (Operations Rachel I-III), and a change in market demands for guns in South Africa, have seen a decline both in the arms trade from Mozambique, and in the illegal retention of AK-47s inside Mozambique. Mozambique's challenge now lies in controlling the flow of new illegal weapons into southern Africa, and the links of senior officials to crime syndicates. (Notes, ref.)

 'A baby who does not cry will not be suckled': Amodeg and the reintegration of demobilised soldiers (Jessica Schafer) – This article examines postwar politics in Mozambique through a case study of the demobilized soldiers' association, Amodeg (Associação Moçambicana dos Desmobilizados da Guerra). Amodeg was created towards the end of the war and reflected the government's move towards multipartyism in the new constitution of 1990. Amodeg is of particular interest because of the special status of demobilized soldiers in the postwar period. Amodeg's incorporation of demobilized soldiers from the armies of both Renamo and Frelimo also provided an important testing ground for the government's commitment to multiparty politics and reconciliation. After a brief history of Amodeg, the author focuses on the relationships between Amodeg, the State and donors/implementing agencies in the international community. Subsequently, she assesses the extent of Amodeg's autonomy and its ability to represent its members. She shows that Amodeg's autonomy was restricted by its material dependence on the government and international agencies. International agencies' insistence on 'civic education' undermined Amodeg's capacity to meet its members demands, address fundamental obstacles to reintegration or promote reconciliation. Yet, the organization has managed to mobilize its constituency to press for their rights and to show its members how to influence the government. (Notes, ref.)

 Quantos somos?: the second national population census of Mozambique (Graham Harrison) – Between 1 and 15 August 1997, Mozambique had its second country-wide population census. This briefing outlines how the census ran – an operation of considerable scale in an extremely poor and war-damaged country, and raises some broader questions relating the census to Mozambique's contemporary politics. The author discusses the history of the census, the first postindependence census of 1980, the 1997 census in Cabo Delgado, and the politics of the census, in particular as part of a broader process of national consolidation. There was general consensus that the population census had been a success, although not all areas had been covered. In sum, it would appear that the census was not a 'Frelimo census'; however, there were allegations on a local level of party political intrigue. (Bibliogr., notes)

Liberal democracy vs. popular democracy in southern Africa (John S. Saul) – This article accompanies an essay reviewing recent literature on 'transitions to democracy' which will be published in the next issue of 'Review of African Political Economy'. There the author contrasts two approaches to the understanding of democratization – the 'political economy of democratization' approach and the more pessimistic 'political science of democratization' approach. The present article analyses two cases of transition in southern Africa which both seem to epitomize the 'political science' approach, yet to contain the longer-term possibility of 'popular democracy'. In South Africa the left accepted the necessity of a negotiated transition to obviate the risk of civil war. However, the ANC, to retain the 'confidence' of local and external capital and of foreign governments, has had to demobilize its popular support. What keeps a progressive agenda alive are the pressures from trade unions, civics, women's organizations etc. In Mozambique, the transition has been less euphoric, more a matter of transition from authoritarian rule and from war than to a democratic regime. As in South Africa, the transition would seem to disempower popular forces, but outside the electoral arena, there are instances of resistance and struggle within civil society.
